Organic chemicals that induce DNA-reactive intermediates (e.g., reactive oxygen species, alkylation, or cross-linking) can produce mutations in mammalian cells. The mutagenic effects of such compounds are typically reflected by gene mutations in mammalian cells. Epistasis (selection of intermediate events that, if reversed, would prevent expression of an observed phenotype), lack of antagonism by known mutagenic chemicals, and response to anticarcinogens are some of the characteristics of such screening systems. Mutagenicity of chemicals may also be reflected by chromosomal aberrations, sister chromatid exchanges, micronuclei, etc. These assays involve mostly indirect detection of gene mutations, and in the case of chromosomal aberrations, they do not discriminate between chromosomal aberrations initiated by DNA damage and those initiated by other mechanisms (e.g., chromosomal rearrangements, cytokinesis errors, etc.). Consequently, the appearance of such mitotic mutations or cytogenetic endpoints generally does not predict mutagenicity in genetic assays. Mutagenicity and carcinogenicity are distinct events, and the suitability of a particular in vitro assay for detecting compounds with the latter activity may vary from those that produce mutations in cells. Thus, mutagenic and carcinogenic compounds may be detected by different in vitro procedures.Before you go out and buy a brand new gaming mouse, take some time to compare the performance of other mice in your life and determine what you need in a gaming mouse.
